E-Safety: iPads 'help improve young pupils' skills'

The study - Mobile Devices in Early Learning - was carried out over two years and involved about 650 pupils

Among their key findings were that:

- The introduction of digital technology has had a positive impact on the development of children's literacy and numeracy skills
- Contrary to initial expectations, principals and teachers report that the use of iPads in the classroom has enhanced children's communication skills
- Children view learning using handheld devices as play and are more highly motivated, enthused and engaged
- Boys appear to be more enthused when using digital technology, particularly when producing pieces of written work
- iPads helped young children to be more motivated and engaged in class,
